

Training and Exercising

Maintaining a constant state of readiness

There has never been a more pertinent time to ensure your organisation is ready to act if faced with an emergency situation.

We all hope that the inevitable will not happen but equally, we have all seen evidence of incidents which have caused harm to individuals; assets; the environment and company reputation. Reducing injuries and safeguarding lives should be the most important factors in any incident.

Effective incident management requires appropriately trained individuals who can respond with the skills that equal the risks and demands.

Health and Safety at Work legislation has a simple but enduring principle – those who create risk are best placed to control that risk (source: A guide to Health and Safety in Great Britain, June 2009).

Incident responders need a thorough understanding of their specific roles, responsibilities and a detailed appreciation of the site's infrastructure.

There is also a need to practice emergency scenarios regularly using what has been learnt through testing and evaluating emergency arrangements.

Key to being prepared:

Being prepared means that companies will have appropriately trained incident responders; good communication; an up to date emergency plan and regularly practiced emergency scenarios.
